

SPECTACULAR FUNERAL FOR MISS DAVISON

London, June 14.—The funeral of Miss Emily Wilding Davison, the Northumberland suffraget who sacrificed her life in an attempt to break up the Derby at Epsom Downs last week as a protest from the militants against the queen's denunciation of them, will be held this afternoon.

The funeral will be the biggest and most spectacular England has ever seen, not even excepting the impos-woman who has died for votes for women.

By her protest she has called the whole world to witness that the women, not only of England, but of all the earth, must and shall be free. The giving of that message has cost her her life, but, as sounds circle from a bell, so from her bier in London today her message circles throughout Christendom.

She is the first woman to suffer violent death for the cause of suffrage, but who can say she will be the last?

Here, in this most solemn ceremony, we declare militancy must go on until the vote for womankind is won. Unless the government wants the lives of more women to be sacrificed it will yield now. Or do they demand that more ready women be martyrs?

Miss Davison's name will be written indelibly on the pages of history and will live in the hearts of women forever!

Militants from every county will march into London to join the parade. Clad in purple and white, with mourning bands on their sleeves, the women will march four abreast in the streets through Picadilly, because Scotland Yard has forbidden them to pass the parliament buildings.

Christabel Pankhurst, exiled daughter of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, has issued the following eulogy from Paris:

London, June 14.—Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, leader of the militant suffragets, was rearrested today as she left the nursing home where she had been confined, and attempted to enter a waiting auto that was to take her to attend the funeral of Emily Wilding Davison. Without a hearing of any kind, she was taken back to Holloway jail to resume her prison sentence.

Here is a "character" given to a servant on leaving her last situation: "The bearer has been in my house a year, less eleven months. During this time she has shown herself diligent at the house door, frugal in work, mindful of herself, prompt in excuses, friendly toward men, faithful to her lovers, and honest when everything was out of the way."
